Primary enclosures.

In the budgie aviary's shelter building, a yellow budgie was located outside its primary enclosure. The budgie was found free flying between the exterior door of the building and the primary enclosure within an access area for the caretakers. The budgie had escaped its primary enclosure and had no access to food, water, or perching in this area. Also, being located in this hallway gave the bird direct access to an exterior door that could lead to further escape outdoors. Birds that escape their primary enclosure could become injured, malnourished, or be lost outdoors. Primary enclosures must be constructed and maintained so that they contain the birds securely.

The bird was returned to its primary enclosure at the time of inspection.
